NUTRITIONAL QUACKERY

The other day an acquaintance said to me: "So what's the harm in a little quackery? We've had medicine men in this country since the white man came to America."

I know what the man means. It fact, if one recalls the amusing stories of O'Henry, the idea of the traveling huckster putting on over on the local folks, or vice versa, evokes thoughts of the goo old days when America was lest troubled than now.

But nutritional quackery, which is rampant today as ever, if no more so, presents real danger, which few people may realize.

There are at least five ways the consumer can be directly affected by nutritional quackery:

1. It can destroy confidence it sound advice. Think of the diets that are promoted that don't work, that people can't stay on. We hear of diets to do away with "monthly to longer surgically curable and of diets to do away with "monthly the consumer can be not find the consumer can be of diets to do away with "monthly the consumer can be consumer surgically curable and only the calcumpant of diets to do away with "monthly the consumer can be consumer surgically curable and only the calcumpant of diets to do away with "monthly the calcumpant of diets of the white man came to find the man came to transmission of diets of do away with "monthly the consumer can be consumer can b that are promoted that don't work, that people can't stay on. We hear of diets to do away with "monthly tensions." Then, there is a so-called "macrobiotic diet." The latter contains nothing but brown rice. It is claimed it offers spiritual enlightenment and that it will cure all illnesses past and present. Generally, such a diet is most often harmless, except for its destruction of confidence, because people will not tolerate it for a very long period of time. Those who do remain on it, die. Thus, at minimum, such diet advice may cause people to suspect even legistrate advice on substitute.
